Governor requests prison funds

Scott Martinson
STAFF WRITER

Gov. Booth Gardner has proposed a gigantic $392 million plan for the next six years to accommodate violators of the war against drugs.
"In the State of Washington, we're getting tough on drug criminals—now we're seeing the results," Gardner said. His plan would include two new 1,000-bed prisons and six work camps to be built by 1996.
Washington's prison population is expected to soar by 50 percent within the next several years due to new anti-drug enforcement laws. The state's Department of Corrections has forecasted a need for 2,232 prison beds by the end of 1991 and 3,352 by 1996. Current prisoner count in Washington is about 6,609. By the year 2002 it may double, solely because of drug enforcements.
Although state officials say no decisions have been made as to where those facilities will be located, 11 communities have expressed interest in housing one.
First action of this plan would be the acceleration of progress on McNeil Island and Clallam Bay prison near Port Angeles, said Gardner.
The proposed prison plan, along with projects which already have been approved, will ride the edge of the state's existing 7 percent debt limit.
Several counties are also asking the legislature for money to build more jails. A recent investigation by the Washington Association of Sheriffs and Police Chiefs showed many county jails, particularly King, Pierce, Yakima and Clark counties, to be greatly overcrowded. Gardner's proposal does not include money for the expansion of such jails or the increasing imprisonment of sex offenders.
Dan Youmans, from the governor's office in Olympia, said that Gardner is working with local officials to investigate and solve county jail population problems. Youmans also said the prison project will be funded through state bonds as well as money from the general fund.
Gardner justifies his proposal by saying, "The alternative to expanding the system is revolving door justice with corrections pushing offenders back into the community as fast as the police and prosecutors are putting new offenders in. That's something that no one wants."

Yellow eyes watch and wait beyond the chain link fence around the grassy central compound. A man crouches by the fence and calls out softly. A dozing wolf cracks a sleepy eye and pricks his ears to listen. Cloudy gray and graceful, he drifts along the fence. Greetings are exchanged: rough laps of wolf tongue on human face; scratching fingers on furry wolf back. Mutual respect and affection live here.

The wolf's name is Rogue, and he is an adult male timber wolf. He is one of about 37 wolves living at Wolf Haven America, a wolf refuge south of Olympia. He was originally found wandering around downtown Portland at the age of one and a half. The Humane Society sent him to live at Cougar Mountain, a big cat refuge. When Cougar Mountain went out of business, Rogue was given a home at Wolf Haven.

Wolf Haven got its start in March of 1982, when Steve and Linda Kuntz, the founders, moved 18 grey wolves from a failed Washington wolf sanctuary to its present location. Later that year the Kuntzs' incorporated Wolf Haven as a non-profit educational and scientific corporation with the purpose of providing sanctuary to captive wolves and protecting wild wolves and their habitats. The refuge covers 60 acres, most of it earmarked for future expansion. Private contributions and donations provide support for the facility and its programs.

One of Wolf Haven's most ambitious programs is the Washington Wolf Project, which was established in October of 1985 by Peter Jenkins. The project is dedicated to re-establishing wolves in Washington State where there have been few sightings since the turn of the century. Main objectives of the project are distribution of data on confirmed wolf sighting and education of the public and wildlife officials about the wolf. Daily workshops were part of an exhibit at the Pacific Science Center from January to June as a part of this program. The exhibit included the story of wolves in this state.

In addition to the project, "assembly type" programs are presented upon request at schools and civic organizations to promote understanding and knowledge of the animals, says Lois Melcher, coordinator of volunteers at Wolf Haven. A Wolf Haven spokesperson, accompanied by a wolf, presents a formal talk and answers questions at these assemblies.

WHO'S AFRAID OF THE BIG BAD

"We're trying to line up people in their corner," says Melcher.

Though some wolves have learned to walk on a leash and observe an audience from a distance, none of the wolves are considered or treated as pets.

"No kind of wild animal makes a good pet," Melcher says. Wolves are independent and "they go their own way," she says. "There's no sense that they will obey you." The wolf is naturally rough in play and friendship and could hurt someone unintentionally.

Wolves are not vicious, Melcher says, but they are fearful of humans. Visitors stand behind a railing five feet from the wolves' enclosures. Only Wolf Haven personnel directly approach the chain link fences which define the boundaries of each pack territory. Even they do not enter the enclosures except to deliver food and water. The animals seem to feel the fences protect them, Melcher says, and lets them feel secure enough to respond affectionately to those at the compound who have earned their trust. They enjoy having their backs and necks scratched and will greet favored humans as they would another wolf, licking faces with great swipes of tongue.

The wolves are fed once a week, says Barbara Andreason, a volunteer tour guide. Each animal gets a 20-35 pound chunk of meat, usually horse-meat, some of which they will bury. Wolf Haven personnel hand carry buckets of water to the enclosures, Andreason says, and when the money is available, a central outdoor plumbing system will make this job easier. Each enclosure protects a small pack of two or three animals, grouped by compatibility and mutual acceptance. Most of the pens contain a male and a female, who automatically become "Alphas," the dominant wolves in a pack. In a larger pack, the Alphas are the leaders, and the only wolves to breed. All other animals are either "Betas" or "Omegas" and are subordinate within the pack hierarchy.

The largest pack at Wolf Haven is a group of four juveniles who were born in May of 1988. One male and three females survived from a litter of five, the only wolves to be born at Wolf Haven. These pups were taken from their parents and raised by hand in order to socialize them to humans. The separation was a traumatic experience to the wolf parents, as wolves bond deeply and affectionately with their young.

The pups live together in a large enclosure and Andreason says they will probably stay together, since they seem to be compatible and have established pack structure. The pups are popular in educational programs because of their youthful charm.

Breeding is actively discouraged at the refuge, says Andreason. Although expansion is a future goal, Wolf Haven's objective is to offer a home to captive wolves in need of sanctuary rather than produce more captive animals. Andreason says there is a greater need for refuge than they can accommodate.

The single litter born at Wolf Haven was accidental, according to Andreason, and most of the wolves have since been neutered to prevent breeding.

Every wolf at Wolf Haven has a name, a history, and a personality. Some have endured abusive treatment before finding sanctuary. Some are shy, some are remote, some are affectionate and friendly. They are the lucky ones, for they are not hunted, trapped, or tormented. Their loss of freedom may ultimately help save the wolf from extinction.

"We hope, through their lives, by studying the nature and role of the wolf, we can help the wolf in the wild and ensure the right of the wolf to survive," says Melcher.

Wolf Haven is open to the public during the winter from Wednesday through Sunday, 10 am to 4 pm. Admission is $3 for adults and $2 for children aged 6-15, with children under six admitted free. For directions, call 264-4695.

Jericho's new beginning

The Wall is down. After separating East from West in Berlin for 28 years, it has finally fallen, at least figuratively. East Germans are allowed to go — and come — almost as they please. Suddenly, the possibility of reunification seems to border on reality.

But reunification hopes will probably remain more the ideas of wishful-thinking Westerners than the goals of the East German government. For while East Germans enjoy more freedom to travel today than any thought possible a week ago, the right to walk across the border is a small step to take in light of the large strides of reform reunification would require. The two Germany's may be close geographically and by heritage, but political differences continue to divide despite the opening of the physical barrier previously between them.

If the opening of the Berlin border does herald further reform, the two nations will draw closer politically. However, it seems difficult to believe that their governments could ever be similar enough for the two to rejoin. Capitalism and socialism are not so easily reconciled, especially since the East German government has no reason to initiate such drastic reforms; their people demand restructured socialism, not capitalism.

All this is not to belittle the significance of the fall of Berlin's wall. It's fall conveys a tremendous sense of hope for the continued easing of East-West tensions throughout the world. It also lends credibility to other East German government promises. But perhaps we should take our cue from the tens of thousands of demonstrators who continue to crowd the streets of Berlin demanding follow-through on promises of political pluralism and free elections. Until these more significant changes have been made, we would be wise to continue to question, as the demonstrators have, the intentions of their government.

Women's needs not being met at HCC

Bev Ott
GUEST COLUMNIST

What makes the women's restrooms at Highline Community College different from any other public facility? One is the lack of necessary supplies in the tampon machines. Another is the addition of condom machines in two of the restrooms.

Why are the tampon machines empty? Mary Lou Holland, head of HCC's Health Services, says the reason was for the safety of women students. Apparently the machines were routinely being ripped off for the money in them. Her fear was that someone would be in the restroom at the time of a break in and could be injured by the perpetrator.

Necessity or luxury item? Webster's Dictionary defines luxury as something enjoyed in addition to the ordinary necessities and comforts of life.

I say, along with many other female students on campus, that tampon machines are a necessity, and condom machines are a luxury in the women's restrooms.

Necessary supplies from these tampon machines are needed by females monthly and sometimes at a moment's notice. Right now you have to go to Building 6 to buy it from the bookstore, or go to the medical clinic.

If the machines are the problem, make them tamper proof. Or another alternative would be to put supplies back in the machines located in the library and the cafeteria where it wouldn't be so easy to rip them off. This would still give the women students a quicker alternative than Building 6.

HCC is a public facility. Let's have necessary supplies in them for women.

Students at Highline Community College speak out on issues that concern us.

Is tearing down the Berlin Wall the first sign of democracy or a ploy to keep East German citizens in check?

I think they are trying to be more democratic. I don't feel they're trying to keep the people in.

Shannon Huertas

I believe its an attempt by the Warsaw block to restructure their economy. They were going to lose all of their talent in their people.

Michael Kesler

I think they are just trying to look out for themselves. If they let the people go, they will want to come back. I don't think they will go democratic. Maybe Socialist.

I would like to think that it's because they're trying to be more democratic. There is really no reason to think that they wouldn't, but you never know.

IN YOUR FACE

A debate of some of today's less critical issues

by Dave Wellington and Marty Peirce, two guys who just don't like each other. In this issue, they discuss the pros and cons of a state run lottery.

Milking the masses

Dave Wellington
OPINION EDITOR

As the defense will no doubt remind you, lotteries are in fact a way for our government to milk money from the masses to pay for needed objectives without openly calling for raised taxes. In other words, a politically sound way to cover its aspirations.

However, it has rather belatedly come to our attention that all that glitters is not guaranteed, regardless of its presumed monetary worth. We feel that it is harmful, and may I say detrimental, for this state to finance its objectives through the mismanagement of some poor un lucky dog" who never really was "gonna win."

With regards to capitalistic endeavors the lottery is a failure. Admittedly, when undertaking any sort of gambling aspiration, both the house and the player have the same objective — to make as much money as they can before the other takes it away. With casinos, the winner is quite clear. On the average, legally run gambling houses in the United States disperse only 4.5 percent of their earnings to winners. That's not a bad return on any investment. With state lotteries, however, monetary successfulness is hotly debated. On the average, states give up to 50 percent of their revenues to successful "lucky dogs." Washington State has done a little better than the average, dishing out only 48 percent to its lucrative patrons. Considering that 11 percent of the money goes directly into the cost of supporting a lottery (ie, advertisements, administrative costs, etc.) the general fund for our state sees roughly 41 percent of the total $194 million in revenue. Certainly that counts as additional income, but it's hardly a good gambling game.

Realistically monetary allowance should give very little consolation when debating an issue of moral implications. The question is, should our state make money off of the institution of gambling? Marty will gladly say yes and plunk down his dollar to back up his misconceptions.

In reality, the lottery is a gambling scheme feeding the state's citizens a line about how they, too, could be rich. We send our children to school to learn arithmetic, logic and economics. We complain because teenagers growing up today cannot comprehend the importance of saving their money. What parent has not had to tell a child that money does not grow on trees? And yet, consistently we bombard the airwaves with "success stories" of people plunking down their dollars and coming away with "the big one." Often the money that pays for the education of our young comes directly or indirectly from the gambling habits of the parents through a state-sponsored lottery.

...both the house and the player have the same objective, to make money.

This is not to mention the fact that the lottery feeds off of the poor. One recent survey showed that those below the poverty level spent 2.1 percent of their income on lotteries. Those who were considered economically "rich" only spent .3 percent. We always get to hear about the lucky one-time betters, the miracle stories that "could happen to you." Unfortunately, not enough coverage is given to the addicts that drop their savings in a sitting, or the $300-dollar-a-week habits created by the convenience of a corner store shelling out pipe dreams for a seemingly small price.

It is interesting to note that professional sports leagues, especially the NFL, refuse to permit or condone legalized gambling, fearing it will corrupt the sport. And yet we as a state can't see that by milking the local public of its money (many hooked on the sport, others on the their perceived would-be futures), we are in danger of that same corruption. An unfounded fear on both accounts? Maybe, although Pete Rose might have an interesting insight.

Deadline is approaching quickly, and Dave "Peach Fuzz" Wellington and I have yet to agree on a subject in which to disagree for this column.

"Personal ethics?" Dave throws out.

"What's that?" I reply.

Nix that.

"Pre-marital sex?" I suggest.

"What's that?" responds Dave.

Hmmm. Now what?

"Hey, I know!" Dave's soprano voice rings out. "How about the Lotto?"

"I don't."

Figures. I guess I underestimated Dave's ability to be a prude, but the conflict was on.

How anybody could argue against the lottery still baffles me. Does Dave really want to spend the rest of his life behind the camera counter at Fred Meyer's? Maybe after I win the lottery I'll give him a better job, doing my laundry or something.

Where's the argument on something that brings nearly $78 million dollars to the state of Washington. It's not our fault the politicians mismanage the money once they get it. Do you have a better idea for raising money for the state? Maybe a bake sale?

So the economic argument is out.

OK, how about a moral argument? Is the state feeding people's weakness to gambling? Oh, please! Give me a break. If people weren't plunking down a dollar here and there on the Lotto, they might just be spending it down at the track, or playing pull tabs at taverns, for a much smaller pay off. Hell, they might just spend it on crack. The Lotto is just doing its little part to help fight the drug epidemic. How's that for morality, Dave!?

Dave snivels that the lottery feeds off the poor. Well, no crap! If you were already rich why would you play the lottery. Of course poor people are going to play it. The only difference between them and you is that they might be rich someday, like me. We'll see who laughs last after I win the $10 million and you're washing my socks.

Face it, Dave, you don't really have a strong argument. You just want to take away any fun or profit I might enjoy. It's a personal vendetta. First you don't want me to swear, next you don't want me to smoke, now you want to take away my Lotto tickets. Geez, Dave, what's next . . . sex? Well, I'm holding up one finger; guess which one it is.

Young couch potatoes lose more than just time when vegging in front of tube

Christina Shires

STAFF WRITER

The biggest threat to the United States is television. The children of today, who are the leaders of tomorrow, are the nations largest audience for this destructor.

Undoubtedly, television is polluting the minds of all of us. However, it is the children we need to be most concerned with because it is them we can protect from the dirt that clouds their bright little minds each and every time they plant themselves in front of this vicious destructor.

By the time children graduate from high school that little TV light will have shined upon their countenance for 18,000 hours, 7000 more hours than they spent in a classroom. Forget the 22,836 sitcoms and 350,000 commercials they will have viewed...by the time they graduate, they will have witnessed 13,000 killings on television.

Granted, there are some earnest people trying to navigate decent television programs. Most television, however, betrays us. Television does teach. The problem is that it mostly teaches lies. It lies about what this world is like and what it means to be human. That the world is violent, but bloodless. That loss, pain and grief are not consequences of violence. That healing is instantaneous. That children are smarter than adults and deserve the same rights and privileges. That sex is free and should be freely given. That most men are self-important. That women are bleeding hearts. That no problem is so great it can't be solved in an hour...oreven a half-hour. That human relationships can be built entirely on false emotions.

A recent study conducted

By the time they graduate they will have witnessed over 13,000 killings.

by Dr. Steven Gortmaker of the Harvard University School of Public Health and Dr. William Dietz of Tufts University School of Medicine shows that the more time children spend in front of the TV, the greater chance they will have at being obese. The study found a 54 percent increase in the prevalence of obesity when comparing statistics on the children in the years of 1976 to 1980 with their counterparts about 15 years earlier. With all of the many commercials advertising sugar-coated and calorie-dense snacks, some researchers find that it's not surprising that kids are falling behind in physical health and fitness. "It all points to a lack of activity, and TV has contributed to it," Gortmaker says.

Television also leads to an increased aggressive behavior in children. When a child sees all of the many stabbings, shootings, killings, rapes and murders on television, it has got to affect him or her in a very negative way. The human mind is somewhat like a computer—what goes in will eventually come out. If violence is constantly being engraved into the mind of a youngster, his natural instinct will be to react to situations in a violent manner. This not only affects the child, his parents, family and friends, but it also affects society as a whole. If children are being raised to react with violence, could this add to or even cause so many of the gangs, abuse and murders in the world today?

This matter of violence is also very closely related to the issue of role models. Television provides questionable role models with unacceptable values for all of us, but especially for children. Television does have many pseudo-heros—only their heros without heroic values. Yes, the chances of Superman or Mr. Rogers polluting the minds of children is highly unlikely, but hey, don't kid yourselves: Superman is a thing of the past. Today it's Freddy Krueger and Eddie Murphy.

The human mind is like a computer—what goes in will come out.

Consider the 18,000 hours children are likely to spend watching TV in the first 18 years of their life. How much of that time could have been spent as quality family time where parents listened, talked to and became a part of their childrens lives? The breakdown in society stems from the breakdown in the family, and the breakdown in the family could stem partly from the misuse of television. Television has become the parent of children—it tells them what to do and how to do it. How can a family grow close and unite together if they don't spend quality time together? The answer is, they can't.

"Parental supervision, including setting rules for TV viewing and watching shows with children, may be the sanest answer to any threat posed by the tube," says Dr. Robert Hauck, a pediatrician from GHC's Northgate Medical Center.

Parents should limit the amount of television their children watch, encourage imaginative play and insist that all homework be completed prior to watching television. Above all, realize that television can greatly influence your child's attitudes and beliefs. Know what your child is watching and ask yourself if this is something you want your child to know about. What goes in will eventually come out.

On Sept. 5 at 6:15 p.m., at 146th Ave S.W. and 8th Ave S.W. in Burien, a four-year-old ran into the street and was hit by a motorist. The victim was pinned beneath the car and dragged 10 feet. The victim suffered a cut above his left eye, abrasions to his right leg, and extensive damage to his left side, including a punctured lung and a puncture to the peritoneum, the sack around his heart.

When a King County policewoman arrived on the scene, she interviewed the driver of the car and inspected the accident site; but no citation was issued to the driver, no ambulance was called to take the victim for medical treatment, and no charges have been filed by the county prosecutor for the incident.

The victim is recovering from life threatening injuries, and no recourse has been initiated against the driver. Why is this? The reason is that the victim is Lucky, a four-year-old Golden Retriever; and an accident involving a pet is not as important as one involving a human child.

The only reason Lucky is alive is that another motorist agreed to accept financial responsibility for the dog's veterinary treatment.

Why is an animal's life less important than a human life? A dog can show its owners affection and compassion and protect their lives. Doesn't it stand to reason that you should show some concern for it in return? When some families find out about her service.

"We put family pets into family surroundings while people are on vacation. The pets are placed with caretakers that can show them the same affection and attention that their owners do," said Lawrence.

"The service does not cost much more than a kennel and I feel that we provide a much more personal level of attention." And what about insurance? Most employers offer medical and dental insurance plans that cover the entire family in the event of illness or injury. Yet how many people provide that type of protection for their pet? Most veterinarians have information about pet insurance that is available to cover your pet. A company called Veterinary Pet Insurance offers two different plans that provide coverage for dogs and cats, and the premium can be paid by credit card over the phone.

While most people agree that animals should be protected against cruelty, some segments of government still leave on vacation send their children to summer camp and their pets to a kennel. At a summer camp, children have the chance to associate with others and participate in a variety of activities. When you send pets to a kennel, they spend most of their day locked in a cage not much bigger than they are.

There are a few boarding companies that offer alternatives to kennels. Pets R Inn is a nationally franchised company with a branch in Kent run by Sally Lawrence. Since Lucky's new owner lives in an apartment complex that doesn't allow dogs as large as Lucky, the owner called Lawrence to feel that animal life is not important. In other parts of the world, however, that attitude is beginning to change. In a Reuter News Service article appearing in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer on Sept. 18, 1989, the Swiss Federal Court ruled that animal life requires protection. The court overturned the traffic-law conviction of a motorist who had slammed on her brakes to avoid hitting two foxes. The animals had bounded onto a road in front of her car. A motorist behind her was unable to stop in time to avoid a collision. In its ruling, the court said respect for animals must override traffic regulations.

That entire ruling contradicts what new drivers are being taught in driver's education programs; if it comes to hitting an animal or swerving and hitting another motorist, it is preferable to hit the animal.

Another motorist is protected by several pounds of metal skin that could be straightened by a good body shop. An animal has only its fur coat.

When we buy cars, we have to pay tax and licensing. Most counties in Washington require licenses for dogs and some require them for cats, yet most pets run around without a license or an identification tag. If your pet is involved in an accident, a license and an ID tag can tell someone how to find you and tell you about your pet. Pet stores and breeders should be required to include licensing fees in the cost of the pet just as car dealers are required to include it when they sell a car. When Lucky was hit he did not have a license or a tag that identified his "legal" owner.

Respect for animals must override traffic regulations.

In a way, pets are like human children. They can pout, beg, cry and can even be hurt by violence and harsh words. For most people, a pet becomes an extension of the family, just like another child. I think owning a pet is a responsibility that requires as much attention and devotion as raising a child. A pet learns to rely on you for his food, shelter, warmth, and love.

Music department alive and growing

Highline curriculum includes both traditional and contemporary styles of music

Tucked away in the strange-looking structure known as the Performing Arts Building, the Highline Community College Music Department is alive and growing. Each quarter about 300 students participate in various activities such as choir, concert band, music theory, electronic music, jazz ensembles, and music history classes.

"For a small school, our music department is doing a good job of presenting both traditional and contemporary classes," said Marius Nordal, HCC music instructor.

Traditional classes include music theory, taught by Ed Fish; concert band, directed by Percy Bronson; and concert choir, directed by Kelly Kunz.

Bronson is a retired instructor from HCC but each week picks up his director's baton to lead about 45 band members in rehearsal. The Concert Band will perform on Nov. 29 in Building 7 at 7:30 p.m. concert band, instrumental students can join community groups such as the Rainier Symphony and Seattle Youth Symphony for college credit at HCC.

Concert Choir meets every Tuesday and Thursday at noon. Kunz said HCC has the potential to have a strong vocal program. "We just need time and more people to stick with it," he said.

Kunz commended the choir for its hard work and being "game to try anything. Music takes a lot of work. The fun comes from doing a good job," he said. Kunz speaks from personal experience. He plays bass professionally in his own band which performs locally.

On the contemporary side, Kunz also directs the Vocal Jazz Ensemble. It consists of 18 students and will be performing with the choir in a Christmas concert on Dec. 6 at 7:30 p.m. in Building 7.

The electronic music class, basically for non-musicians and non-music majors is a class teaching the "hows" of synthesizers, an electronic keyboard which is used to produce sounds that cannot be obtained from ordinary musical instruments.

"Students don't realize that most sounds we hear today are not real. They are artificial sounds created by computers. The electronic music class is part of computer literacy," said Marius Nordal, instructor of the class.

Nordal also teaches jazz history. Two-thirds of the class is spent listening to jazz recordings and the other third talking about the history. Jazz is a relatively new musical style, being only 70 years old.

"A new style of jazz is created with each generation," Nordal said. "It has changed four to five times in the last 70 years." He keeps up with these changes by playing piano every weekend with the Fred Radke band.

Ed Fish teaches the history of rock and roll. The course includes the study of the beginning of rock and roll through what's happening in rock today.

"Every student is an expert. We have a very knowledgeable class," said Fish, who is an expert himself, playing trumpet and bass when he has the chance.

"I can't seem to stay away from it," Fish said. He also is the director of the Jazz Ensemble, a vocal and instrumental group, which will perform on Nov. 20 at 7:30 p.m. in the Performing Arts Theater, Building 4.

Jazz ensemble one of the best kept secrets at HCC

Patti Rathbun
STAFF WRITER

On Monday, Nov. 20, Highline Community College's Jazz Ensemble will perform at 7:30 in the Performing Arts Building Theater, Building 4.

The jazz ensemble, according to Ed Fish, director of the group, is "one of Highline's better kept secrets."

The ensemble is a 22-piece band consisting of professional musicians, community members, and students. A standard "big band," it is made up of five saxophones, five trombones, five trumpets, a four-piece rhythm section and three vocalists. The members range in age from 14 to 50.

"These people all have one thing in common. They play and sing very well," Fish said.

"I'm quite amazed at the quality and performance of the group."

Feature vocalists at the concert will include Tory Weiner, 14-year-old junior high student from Kent; her sister, Tammy Weiner, a junior at Kent Meridian; and Marna Larson.

Solo instrumentalists include students Stan Bolinger on bass trombone, Greg Parman on tenor sax, and Dan Horton on alto sax. Professional musician Doug Canning will play trumpet. James Day, owner of Farmer's Music in Burien, will solo on guitar. Breon McFarlane, a King County policeman, and Cliff Swiggett, a computer expert from Microsoft in Bellevue, will be featured on trombone. The concert will spotlight arrangements by Don Schamber, Sammy Nestico, Francy Boland, and Rob McConnell.

The jazz ensemble has been in existence for six years at HCC and it is totally supported by the student body. Fish said this financial support is a "unique circumstance. Without the support of the associated student body we couldn't have the ensemble."

Fish also thanked Dean of Students Phil Swanberg, Coordinator of Student Activities Bruce Mackintosh, and Assistant of Student Activities Denny Steussy for their help with publicity and stage management.

"I heartily encourage the students to come to the concert and see where their money is going. I don't think they will be disappointed," he said.

For years KISW reigned as the king of rock and roll stations in Seattle.

Then it created a monster, or at least a nuisance, called KXRX. It's been nearly three years since Steve West, then general manager at KISW, left to form his own rock station. KISW was sold to an Ohio insurance company, and with the new ownership came some new rules and a pay cutback for management.

West wasn't the only one fed up with the situation at KISW. A number of the disc jockeys, including Bo Roberts, Dean Carlson, and the tremendously popular team of Crow and West, joined their boss at KXRX.

"It was really a crazy thing to do, just quit a station like KISW," said Carlson, KXRX's late night DJ. However, "The day I quit it felt so good to get out of there because there was so much shit going on."

While KXRX has established its own identity as "the X," it continues to live under the shadow of its mother station. Carlson says that he gets calls from listeners on "Double Shot Thursday," a KISW habit. More importantly though, the X is trying to establish its own identity musically. Carlson says that they're still experimenting in the music area. They're rocking a lot more at night, playing some old rock but trying to be different than KISW; by playing new rock the X succeeds.

"We don't play that much classic rock. We're trying to be that one station that's really trying to sound like it's 1989 or 1990. You can only play L.A. Woman so many times," said Carlson, perhaps taking a jab at his old mates at KISW.

Carlson pointed out that starting out anew isn't always a disadvantage. "The nice thing about being a new station is we basically had to start off with a new library. We started with buying CD's," he said.

Though the station's music format might not suit everyone, the personality of the jocks and the station itself is undeniably unique. The X recently promoted one of its fictional air personalities, officer Lee Groinman, in the recent mayoral election in Seattle. Groinman, a cross between John Wayne, Clint Eastwood, and Freddy Krueger, unfortunately lost. Roy Otis, a gravelly-voiced-who-knows what, has sold many a "Bite Me" T-shirt to X listeners.

These characters and others are, for the most part, creations of Gary Crow and Mike West, better known simply as Crow and West. The X morning team was for years a mainstay in the afternoons on KISW, and the jocks' popularity has not diminished with their change of address. The two have reportedly turned down offers from bigger stations in bigger cities to remain where they are.

In the afternoons, Robin and Maynard, the smart-mouthed and often bickering male-female team have joined up with part-time sidekick Bill Nye the science guy. Plenty of Seattle radios have stayed tuned to 96.5 because of this combination.

Bo Roberts is the crazy, screaming DJ Seattle loves. During the Thunderword's visit to the X studios, Roberts was overheard on an off-the-air phone conversation with a listener screaming, "Well fuck-ingA!! Shake it mamma, come on!" Followed by, "Oh, baby! Abuse me!"

Fortunately for Roberts' career, he saves those conversations for off the air.

Going down the hallway to the studio, "The Wall" stands out. This clean new office building has been plagued by graffiti. "It all started somewhere on here with a drawing Steve Miller did," says Carlson. Once Miller put his mark on "The Wall" it escalated from there. Many of today's rock stars that have visited the X studios have left their mark. "I think we have Julian Lennon's cigarette butt," said Carlson as he inspected "The Wall."

Normally, it takes a new station five years to really crack a city. While the X is still in its infancy stages, it has definitely made its mark on Seattle, and there's still two years left on the timetable.

Look out KISW.

We're trying to be the one station that's really trying to sound like it's 1989 or 1990. You can only play L.A. Woman so many times.

Grease: The Colonel's secret ingredient

Steve McClure
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Tired of the same old greasy hamburgers? Well, I guess you may be ready to make the switch over to greasy chicken. While the Colonel's chicken is a welcome break from the dull drum called fast food, the amount of grease they cook it in could be greatly reduced. For a company that claims that they "do chicken right," their best items are those without chicken in them.

KFC has probably come the closest of any of the fast food restaurants to perfecting cole slaw. They have found the mixture of sweetness and cabbage that has become most favorable to the "pallet". It is best eaten very slowly, rather than inhaling the small container in two swallows, so that each morsel can be truly appreciated.

If you can get them while they're still warm, I highly recommend Kentucky Fried Chicken's buttermilk biscuits. Once again these are best eaten slowly with just a hint of butter and honey. If you're feeling real creative you may slide the biscuit through the mashed potatoes and gravy that comes with most dinners.

Of the chicken item that can be tasted through the grease the choice is narrowed down to the chicken sandwich or the Kentucky Nuggets. Both of these are a small step ahead of their competition as far as taste goes, but that can be attributed to the Colonel's 11 herbs and spices.

One item of KFC's menu which separates it from all others is their side dish of corn on the cob. The golden corn comes with a corn dog stick implanted in its base for easy eating. Smothered with butter this delicacy is without equal in the fast food industry.

Wright holds attention without being kinky

Craig Snyder

STAFF WRITER

The stage at the Paramount Theater in downtown Seattle was bare with the exception of a stool, microphone, and the flood of magenta light pouring from above. The stillness did not last for long; the crowd began to explode with cheers as Steven Wright calmly advanced on stage.

You have probably seen Wright on television. The monotone, philosophical comedian has performed on such shows as Johnny Carson, David Letterman, and Late Night with Rob Costas. However, you have not really seen Steven Wright in his full form until you have seen him live.

Wright's performance contradicts the popular stand-up comedy routine. Most comedians such as Eddie Murphy and Sam Kinison base their performance on the use of slandering material and profanity. Wright's material does not rely on the exploitation of minorities. Rather, his humor is more cerebral. Wright makes the audience work as hard as he does when delivering a joke, and the result is fantastic humor.

Wright's stage presence is dominant. His show is not action packed. He doesn't run around the stage or even work up a sweat. He does, however, hold your attention throughout the 60 minutes of his show by using the momentum from his last joke to carry you over to his next joke.

Blue Sky, a Seattle jazz group, entertained Highline Community College Tuesday, Nov. 14 in the student lounge. The five-piece band opened their set at noon with "Wish I Were Here" and went on to fill the hour with their unique brand of fusion. Highlights of the performance included a 3-minute melodic bass solo by Kevin Rolstad (far right).

Steppe Sisters rely on talent

Craig Snyder

No, they're not really the Supremes, they're definitely not Bobby Brown, and you won't see them on MTV. However, the Steppe Sisters do have the stage presence of the Supremes and the energy of Bobby Brown.

Performing various tunes from various artists, these three ladies, Deborah Kaye, Tammi Katzin, and Becky Thatcher, can keep the audience's attention on stage with the blend of their voices and their enthusiasm. It's refreshing to see beautiful women rely on their immense talent and not kinky costumes. When they opened their set with "Supremes Name of Love," their audience went vintage 60's. They continued on performing songs from the 60's without missing a beat.

As a group, they are a real treat to see. They are a real treat to see. They are a real treat to see.

It's not easy to get the crowd to sing along. While performing these high-energy songs, the three of them seemed almost to be if that was all they were meant to do in life. With the audience screaming in Halloween apparel, the highest dressed and Thatcher showed them down with a ballad from Basia's '88 album.

Despite the fact that the songs they perform are not the originals, their ability as entertainers more than compensates for it. According to Margaret Perugini of Andy Mirkovich Entertainment Unlimited, the Steppe Sisters have been performing together since January 1988. After seeing the way they work together on stage, one may suspect they've been together longer than that.

They're not the Supremes, and they're not Bobby Brown, but they are definitely entertaining. Their next public performance will be at the

If you like to run, bike or walk, Barney Clark, Director of Parks and Recreation in Kent, suggests the Green River Trail or the Interurban Trail. Clark says the Interurban goes straight through the valley along the railroad tracks. For runners he suggested the 10-kilometer run along the Green River trail in Kent. It starts in Russell Park, makes a circle and returns to the park. He also suggested the "Ol' Fishing Hole," but it's for fisherfolk under 14 years. It is run in co-operation with the Kent rotary club. The game department stocks it with fish, and there is a fishing platform for handicapped youngsters. Clark says it is closely monitored but you might take a young friend there and watch your friend catch fish.

The Gene Coulon Park is at the south end of Lake Washington in Renton. Recreation Supervisor Terry Higashiyama is quite proud of the botanical walk there. The Cedar River Park runs for 1.5 miles from the Renton Public Library along the Cedar River to the mouth of Lake Washington. Higashiyama says there is a small boat launch there for kayaks and canoes which few people know about.

Lady spikers take division title

Next major challenge : conference championship

The Highline Community College women's volleyball team finished up a perfect regular season Nov. 8 by beating a feisty crew from Olympic Community College in three sets: 15-9, 15-8, 15-12. The Lady Thunderbirds take their 10-0 Northern Division record with them to the conference tournament today and tomorrow at Mt. Hood Community College in Gresham, Oregon. HCC and Mt. Hood are the only ones totting perfect records going into the tournament.

HCC's volleyball team clinches the division title against Olympic Community College.

Olympic forced the ladies to work for their perfect record as they continued to battle back from apparent defeat. In the opening game HCC jumped out to a 13-2 lead, and it looked like a rerun of the last match with the Bremerton spikers, which lasted around 45 minutes. But OCC fought back, scoring seven unanswered points before Highline slammed the door on the semi-comeback.

The second game was a floor burner as Olympic pulled out to a small lead early. The Lady T-Birds played it close until it evened at eight; then the team bumped off seven points to win the game.

OCC came out in the third game determined to give Highline a run for its money. Neither team could get any kind of scoring run going, as the two teams exchanged the lead several times. HCC finally pulled out to a 14-12 but had to battle for the final point.

HCC hitter Tammy Carroll felt that the team had problems getting a side out during the match. "We really have to work on our side outs," Carroll stated. She added that serving was also an area that needed some work. "When our serving is strong, our offense and defense goes well."

Despite its perfect league record, Carroll says, "We're not satisfied yet; we'll be satisfied when we win conference."

With the bang from the starter's gun and the splash of a swimmer's body slicing through the calm surface of the pool, the Highline Community College swim team is back into another year of competition. The team is held together by 24-year veteran coach Milton Orphan. This year's team is currently made up of 11 men and 3 women, and Orphan is actively recruting members to round out the women's side of the team. "We're really hurting for women swimmers; anybody who wants to swim on the team, we sure welcome them," Orphan said.

Highline's new squad debuts against Evergreen State College with mixed emotions. "I'm scared about the first meet," said Cheryl Nordness, one of HCC's newest additions to the team. On the men's side of the pool, the confidence level beams with enthusiasm. Tony Lyon, a returning swimmer from last year, said, "The caliber of the guys is a lot better this year, the team is a lot better this year."

According to the team's skipper, the competition in the league is rather tough. Only two community colleges in the state have swim teams; the rest of the competitors come from four-year universities. "It depends on how many of our swimmers qualify and what the strengths of the other teams are," Orphan said. If the past is any indication of the future, things look good for the team. "Over the past 24 years, we've had about 74 percent wins, and we've never lost to a community college."

As the air streams by and the road hums from the sound of an engineless machine, you discover bicycling is like no other form of transportation.

The fascination for cycling can now be experienced at the campus of Highline Community College. A cycling club has been added to the sports agenda at HCC. Thunderbird Cycling will be competing in the Northwest Collegiate Conference of Bicycling, directed by Kelly Wieber of the University of Oregon.

The conference involves about 25 schools, 80 percent of which are four-year institutions. It hosts races in Oregon, Idaho, Washington, and Northern California. The conference championships, last year hosted by the Tri-Cities, will be held in April. All competitions are governed by the United States Cycling Federation.

"We're opening the club to any students who are interested in competitive cycling or are already involved in competitive cycling," says Ric Castagna, founder of Thunderbird Cycling. Cyclists will not only be training for the collegiate activities but also for the Seattle to Portland competition, a road race of 212 miles to be held June 30 through July 2.

Castagna says, "This is the only club of this type in this area that is school affiliated." Although the club will receive some funding from HCC, Castagna is looking for local sponsors.

"We would like to host a conference race here in early spring," says Castagna. He believes this would give HCC's cyclists the exposure needed to be recognized by four-year colleges which have larger cycling groups. He would like to receive a scholarship in cycling from a four-year institute. But his ultimate dream is to ride in the 1991 nationals and then in the 1992 Olympics.

An organizational meeting was held Nov. 15 for the club, but is not too late to become involved in the organization. A sign-up sheet is located in the student activities office for those who would like more information.

Sonics' goal for season: unlock McKey's potential

More points from the post for McKey

Steve Duncan

STAFF WRITER

The Seattle SuperSonics received a wake-up call speech from Coach Bernie Bickerstaff the day before the scheduled game against the Charlotte Hornets. Sonic players seemed to have just been going through the motions for the first two games of the season. Finally against the Hornets they erupted and gave a 128-88 thrashing to the second-year expansion team on Nov. 7.

The one man who can make this team have consistent intensity, and has the potential to elevate them to championship quality, is Derrick McKey. The 6-foot-10 McKey has the ability to play all five positions in the starting unit and do it well. He has excellent defensive skills and an equally impressive all-around offensive game.

McKey's problem in the past has been inexperience and his unselfishness. In the game against the Hornets he seemed to take a leadership role, rather than just being one of the guys. While anyone can look like an all-star playing the Hornets, McKey's offensive prowess was encouraging. He made 8 out of 13 from the field and sank all 5 of his free throws to total 21 points that night. He also had 5 rebounds and blocked 2 of the Hornets shots, along with a few eye-catching passes.

Throughout the game McKey showed he is on the road to develop his talent. This year McKey will need to maintain his efforts to grow more offensive minded. He doesn't have to do it by shooting the ball more but by just being involved in a large number of the offensive plays. McKey needs to touch the basketball at least once on most plays.

McKey's growth was illustrated on several occasions during this game and seemed to be a vast improvement. In the first quarter of action he played in the paint and gathered the attention of both Hornet centers, starter J.R. Reid and reserve Dave Hoppen. Neither could come close to stopping McKey's movement in the key, and that inside game is something he and Bickerstaff hope to take advantage of all season.

On one play McKey caught Hoppen napping. McKey faded out into 3-point territory; he then dashed for the hoop and dunked an alley-oop pass he received from Sonics' point guard Nate McMillan.

Bickerstaff wants McKey to handle the ball more because when McKey has the ball positive things happen. Sonics' fans have reason to be excited because McKey and Coach Bickerstaff, as seen by their performance against the Hornets, seem intent on making this happen.

Are you aware that the college you attend has a championship cross country team, an undefeated volleyball team, a hard fighting soccer corps and an excellent swimming team?

People are traveling from all over the world to visit Seattle for the 1990 Goodwill games yet only eight people, mostly moms and dads, spotted the stands at the last home volleyball game, a game at which our team clinched a division title with a record of 10-0.

As one student body we all should feel some allegiance to HCC sports. For all of you who doubt it, the one item that is not lacking at each venue is excitement. If anything, the level is more exciting as the participants are in this for only two reasons: fun and future advancement. Their performance today determines a lot of what tomorrow brings. From an economic angle, HCC on-campus sports are brought to you by the Student Activities budget; therefore each one of these on-campus events are free.

If you feel you don't have the time, what would you rather be doing with two hours worth of it: sitting at home reading a boring Math 101 book or watching a fast-paced volleyball game, soccer match or swim meet?

For all of you who lack the interest in our on-campus sports, my suggestion for fan support is to try and recognize those campus athletes in your daily classes and at least tell them to keep up the great work. They are trying with all they have to make the team shine; and again, knowing they have your support shows them you care.

Soccer coach dispute resolved

Coaching post to be filled by assistant

Highline Community College's soccer team reached a resolution this week between the coaching staff and the Athletic Department. Head coach Don Carmel said goodbye to his players and turned in his letter of resignation Nov. 5. The letter was delivered to H.C.C.'s Athletic Director Don McConaughy, who in turn appointed assistant coach Ted Sedlacek as acting head coach.

The resignation stemmed from Carmel's decision to pull the soccer team off the field in a match against Spokane Falls Community College on Oct. 30. "I pulled the team from the game because I thought it was too rough," Carmel said. "It was a dirty game and I felt the officials weren't going to do anything about it."

Carmel coached the Thunderbird's for the past year-and-a-half; before that he was a player on the team.

"Don did a lot for this program. We parted as friends." -- Don McConaughy

Speaking in favor of Carmel, McConaughy said, "Don did a lot for this program. We parted as friends." The coaching staff for next year will be decided at the end of this season.
